The musical motorway keeping drivers safe

A motorway in Fujairah, near Dubai, now lets drivers play Beethoven's Ninth symphony as they cruise along! Special rumble strips cut into the road create music when cars hit around 100 kph (60 mph), turning a regular drive into a mini concert. Called the "Street of Music," it's the first of its kind and even helps keep drivers safe by encouraging them to stick to the speed limit!

Look after bugs to grow more grub!

Scientists have found that farmers who look after wildlife on their farms grow more food. By planting flowers, leaving grassy patches, and providing homes for birds and bugs, farmers saw more bees, worms, and helpful insects. These creatures help crops grow better, which means more food in the end. It's a win-win for nature and the farms!

Penguin pedicures

Penguin chicks at Blackpool Zoo are getting pedicures, but not for fashion! Zookeepers are painting some of their tiny claws with nail varnish to tell the baby birds apart. The chicks all look super similar, so this fun trick helps staff keep track of their health and growth.

Weekly raves are boosting grades

A primary school in Leicester is going viral online for its fun weekly raves! Every Friday at 2pm, headteacher Mr T transforms the school hall into a full-on dance party, with booming music and big beats. As soon as the music starts, students rush in to dance - letting off their energy and boosting their mood. Mr T says it helps everyone feel happy and connected, and it's boosting grades and attendance too!

Killer whales? More like kind whales!

Scientists in Canada have spotted orcas doing something very curious - they've been bringing gifts of fish, seabirds, and even seals to humans. The killer whales dropped their "presents" in front of researchers and seemed to wait to see what would happen. Experts think it could be their way of sharing food and kindness, and that orcas might recognise humans as thinking beings like themselves!
